

ABSTRACT

A CRITICAL ANALYSIS OF THE FINANCIAL MODELS EMPLOYED BY STUDENT NEWSPAPERS IN THE CALIFORNIA STATE UNIVERSITY SYSTEM

In times of reduced budgets, the student newspaper is an easy target. Without a solid financial model, the newspaper will inevitably be forced to make cuts that are ultimately reflected in the paper's overall quality. The purpose of this study is to analyze the different financial models employed within the California State University (CSU) system and examine which revenue models are most successful.

By focusing on topics such as independence, funding sources, and online publishing, this study illustrates how papers in the CSU system can maximize their resources and put themselves in position to prosper in the future. As this study demonstrates, maintaining a financially successful student paper is a complex process that requires constant monitoring. With prudent planning, newspapers in the CSU system will continue to serve an essential role for years to come.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

To write a thesis, it takes a village. This study would not have been completed without the unwavering support of my loving wife Christine, whose many sacrifices during the course of my research enabled me to give this study the attention it deserved. She is truly my everything.

Just as the study would be unfinished without my wife, it wouldn't have started without the encouragement of my supervisor in the Office of Research and Sponsored Programs, Dr. Thomas McClanahan, who gently suggested the idea of graduate school, and then gave me every opportunity to succeed. My colleague Christina Roybal also provided immeasurable support at every step.

From our first meeting nine months ago, my thesis committee has played an invaluable role in the development of this study. I am particularly grateful to Dr. Tamyra Pierce for her guidance and positive encouragement throughout this journey. Selecting Dr. Pierce to chair my thesis committee was easily my smartest decision during this study. Professors Greg Lewis and Tommy Miller also deserve special mention for helping to keep me focused whenever I started heading in the wrong direction. At The Collegian, Professor Lewis and Virginia Sellars-Erxleben gave graciously of their time and helped me better understand the business of college newspapers today.

One of the primary benefits of working on this study was the interaction with many faculty advisers and business managers from newspapers across the country. I thank them all for taking the time to share their paper's financial data and related information. Most importantly, I thank them for their remarkable dedication to student journalists and the quality newspapers they produce.
